The Internationalization testing process is crucial to companies entering global software markets and is a necessity to avoid serious quality issues during global product rollouts.

SQA Partners provides a comprehensive Internationalization test process that enables software companies to save money and time to market. This process involves checking software for hard-coded strings, providing pseudo-translation services as well as running black box tests according to an extensive test matrix. We also test the test process to make sure test suites are internationalized.

After software has been localized, SQA Partners will perform detailed tests to ensure that localized products meet agreed acceptable levels of quality and schedule requirements.

During this process, SQA Partners will execute tests to verify products functionally, under a matrix of language operating systems; and platforms, if required. SQA Partners currently test products under Windows, Linux, Unix and Macintosh platforms, as well mobile platforms. User interface testing will also be carried out to ensure a lack of truncated text and non-translated items.

Having performed all localization tests, SQA Partners can deliver a Gold, signed-off product, ready for release.

Using SQA Partners WebMatrix; a web-based project tracking tool; clients can track real-time progress against project schedule. Just one of the reasons blue chip companies use SQA Partners test services; and as well as our commitment to quality, we offer exceptionally low costs and a flexible approach.
